Township wants help with road

Boston at odds with U.S. park

By Sheryl Harris
Beacon Journal Staff Writer

Boston Township is trying to win the help of its neighbors in its standoff with the Cuyahoga Valley National Park.

The township, most of which was devoted to create the park, wants the park service to help pay for road maintenance.

The park service has said it isn't allowed to spend federal money on township roads without an act of Congress.

"We have no tax base," township Trustee Randolph Bergdorf said. "We can't subsidize the activities of the park service anymore."

Bergdorf on Wednesday night asked the Cuyahoga Valley Communities Council, which is made up of representatives from communities surrounding the park, to help it make its case for road maintenance money.

It was the park's decision to build a $1.8 million education center on Oak Hill Road that prompted the township's public plea for support. Oak Hill Road has been partially closed, awaiting repairs, for four years.

The park owns most of the property along Oak Hill and several other roads in the township. But because a few privately owned homes remain, the township is forced to retain ownership — and assume repair costs, Bergdorf said.

The state two months ago refused the township's request for Lane 1 money, saying too few people would be affected by the road repairs.

"What they (park officials) do has an impact on us, and we really have no one to turn to," Bergdorf said several hours before addressing the council. "Someday, we're going to run out of money."

"We're going to go broke. We're just telling them it's going to happen," he said.

John Debo, park superintendent, told residents at the meeting that the park would not consider using a drive off Riverview, a county road in the township, for access to the center.

"That's not a reasonable alternative," he said.

The council's reaction was lukewarm.

Members held out little hope Wednesday night that the council would intervene.
